While I agree that it's unclear what you are trying to achieve, it makes no sense to the user. Specifically, you probably want two split zones and two forms, rather than having two forms and two split zones, as it means that the user can always know whether or not they are in the outer (unwanted) portion of their page. This should be the way it's done, so that the user knows that they are where they are supposed to be. Otherwise, we have an ambiguous system, where it's not clear if you are on the list of names and that you're on the list, or if you're on the list and in the list. You seem to be making the assumption that they're the same thing, but they're not. It's simply a matter of the user not being told they're in the content area, until they click the link or the form (in a visible and (intentionally or not) confusing way). The outer area is always considered the outer area. It is never considered the content area. "Our time is our own," said Karl Sandauer. "Make a good use of it," said Elmer.
